Introduction:

Employee motivation and engagement training for managers on stay conversations and retention is a five-day course for line managers, team leaders and HR business partners, ending with a Team Engagement and Retention Action Plan for a case team. Many units lose capable people they never knew were unhappy, because survey results go unread and one-to-ones drift into status updates. Nominees already lead a team or advise those who do, and the course is taught through rehearsed role-plays with structured feedback. CoreConcept Training Center delivers this course on employee motivation and engagement.

Course Objectives:

- Assess the engagement drivers and motivation signals present in their own team using turnover, absence and pulse data
- Apply self-determination, expectancy and goal-setting principles to the weekly management of individual team members
- Conduct stay conversations, one-to-ones and career conversations that surface what keeps each person in the role
- Match recognition and non-financial rewards to what individual employees value
- Identify disengagement and flight risk early and interpret a team engagement survey report with the team
- Produce a Team Engagement and Retention Action Plan with owners, follow-up checkpoints and measures

Target Audience:

- Line managers accountable for the output, attendance and retention of a permanent team
 - Team leaders and supervisors who run daily work allocation and weekly one-to-one meetings
 - HR business partners who coach managers on engagement survey follow-up and avoidable resignations
 - Department heads who review team engagement results and approve recognition budgets
 - Project and shift leads who keep motivation steady across rotating or remote team members

Skills You Will Gain:

- Team Engagement Diagnosis
- Motivational Needs Profiling
- Stay Interviewing
- One-to-One Coaching
- Recognition Design
- Career Dialogue
- Flight Risk Assessment
- Survey Results Facilitation

Why Attend This Course:

- Deliver a Team Engagement and Retention Action Plan to the department head and HR business partner who oversee the team
- Decide which recognition, autonomy or development lever fits each team member instead of applying one incentive to all
- Avoid the cost and disruption of losing a valued employee whose warning signs went unnoticed
- Share stay conversation and one-to-one templates with fellow supervisors so the whole unit follows one routine

Conclusion:

Back at work, the participant gives the department head and HR business partner a Team Engagement and Retention Action Plan that names the drivers to strengthen, the people at risk and the conversations already scheduled. Managers use it to decide where recognition, autonomy and development effort go first, and HR uses it to target support. After the first ninety days, the unit should review pulse scores, voluntary departures and whether planned stay and career conversations actually took place.

Frequently Asked Questions FAQ:

What should participants prepare before employee motivation and engagement training for managers?

Participants should currently lead a team or advise managers who do. Bringing recent team survey results, turnover figures or notes from one-to-ones helps them apply the role-plays and build an action plan around a real team.

How does employee motivation and engagement training for managers differ from employee experience or talent management courses?

It concentrates on what one manager does each week with one team: conversations, recognition and follow-up. Employee experience courses redesign organisation-wide journeys and HR services, while talent management courses run calibrated reviews and succession across the business.

Why are stay conversations central to employee motivation and engagement for managers?

Stay conversations ask current employees what keeps them and what might make them leave, while there is still time to act. Unlike exit interviews, they give the manager specific, personal information to adjust work, recognition and development before a resignation.

What do participants take back from employee motivation and engagement training for managers?

Participants take back a Team Engagement and Retention Action Plan for a case team, with a driver baseline, flight risk grid, conversation guides, a recognition menu and a ninety-day follow-up rhythm they can adapt to their own team.
