Technical depth: Practitioner · Practical mode: Role-play

Introduction

Most capability is built on the job, yet many managers still default to telling, fixing and checking rather than developing the people who report to them. The result is teams that depend on the leader for answers, high performers who leave for lack of growth and one-to-ones that never move beyond status updates. This Core Concept course equips leaders to coach and mentor with recognised models, structured conversations and clear agreements. Participants practise in observed role-play and leave with a Coaching and Mentoring Plan for their own team.

Course Objectives

- Distinguish coaching, mentoring and managing, and choose the right approach for each development need in a team
- Conduct structured coaching conversations using the GROW, CLEAR and OSKAR models
- Apply listening, questioning and SBI feedback techniques in day-to-day leadership conversations
- Set up mentoring relationships with clear agreements, goals and review points
- Handle resistance, ethical boundaries and the line between coaching and performance management
- Produce a Coaching and Mentoring Plan for the participant's own team

Target Audience

- Managers responsible for developing the capability and performance of their direct reports
 - Senior specialists and team leads who mentor less experienced colleagues
 - HR business partners and talent managers supporting coaching and mentoring programmes
 - Learning and development managers building an internal coaching culture

Conclusion

Leaders who coach and mentor well build teams that solve their own problems and keep their best people. This course moves from the distinctions between coaching, mentoring and managing, through the principal coaching and mentoring models, to the listening, questioning and feedback skills that make conversations work and the difficult cases that test them. The final day puts every model into observed practice and turns the learning into a Coaching and Mentoring Plan that participants apply with their own team.
